

The recent attempts to water down long-standing FCC rules on cross-ownership are just one more in a series of anti-democratic, corporate-friendly moves that show to just whom "our" government is responsive. Is it only me, or is there anyone else who sees that the concentration of ownership of various media (print, radio, television) in one media "market" is likely to result in bland, corporate power-friendly "journalism" and the replacement of news and public service broadcasting (whatever is left of it) with empty diversions and propaganda? Sorry to have bothered you, now get back to structurally dismantling what little is left of "democracy" in what used to be "America".

Thank you for your time.
